This course examines the nature of world views and why they matter; it will first study the general principles and elements of world views, and then show how they are the building blocks of possible worlds, such as the Mythic World View, the Relativistic World View, and the Platonic World View. The course will study and compare at least four different possible ways of viewing the world.

With the technological developments of the 20th century physics laboratories became more and more complex. In addition to housing many new apparatus and measuring devices, these laboratories required more elaborate buildings, and for their operation, required the work of several (to many) trained experimentalists.
